

PROJECT
ALL PHOENIX EX-SILHOUETTE

SCENE-1

SCENE-2

SCENE-3

SCENE-4

SCENE-1

Act I: The Anomaly

One thousand years ago. The Himalayas.

In a world ruled by the strict laws of life and death, a complete glitch appeared.

An old man was walking through a deadly snowstorm. Deep in the white drifts, he found a young woman. She looked 20 years old, but she was not normal. Her hair was as white as the snow itself.

The old man brought her to his hut and called the village. When she opened her eyes, the entire room stopped breathing.

Her pupils were a burning, piercing crimson red.

Panic hit her instantly. She had no memories. To her ears, the voices of the villagers sounded like terrifying, broken noise. In total terror, her hand instinctively grabbed the strange bracelet on her wrist. She touched it.

[The Activation]

The moment her fingers pressed the metal, the chaotic noise vanished. In its place: absolute clarity.

She looked at the frozen crowd and spoke perfectly in their own language:

"Please... do not be afraid of me. I do not remember my past, but I can hear you now. Thank you for saving my life."

A language completely mastered in one single second. The villagers stood in total shock. They did not know it yet, but they were looking at an existence that defied all human logic.

Act II: The Glitch in Time

Time is an absolute law. Humans grow old. Humans wither. Humans die.

But for this woman, that law was completely broken.

Thirty years passed. Fifty years passed. The children grew into old men. The old man who saved her turned to dust. But she remained untouched. Still 20 years old. Her skin remained perfect. Her red eyes only grew sharper.

She spent every single day training. She gained unbelievable strength. She mastered warrior skills no human had ever seen.

Yet, she remained entirely humble. She did not boast. She wept for her friends when they died of old age, while she stayed forever young.

She did not desire power. She did not desire fame. But the universe has a way of forcing power onto those who do not seek it.

Act III: The Force of 1,000 Souls

The village grew rapidly. Soon, it became a massive fortress of over 1,000 people. Then, the crisis arrived. A cruel, evil king had conquered all the surrounding realms. His massive army was now marching up the mountain to slaughter this final village.

The people were crying. They were leaderless.

All 1,000 citizens ran to her house. They fell to their knees in the snow, begging her:

"Please! You do not age! You have the wisdom of generations! We do not need a chief anymore... we need a monarch! We choose you to be our First Queen!"

She shook her head, her voice completely humble:

"I am not a queen. I am just a girl from the snow. I am one of you."

A rejection born from true humility. But against the desperate cries of one thousand souls, her refusal meant nothing. To save them, she accepted the burden.

The Kingdom of Crysalune was born. And she became QUEEN QUARTHA.

Act IV: The Divine Elevation

The moment the crown touched her white hair, the entire atmosphere shifted.

To the people, she was no longer just a friend. She was an overwhelming presence of absolute safety.

Looking up at her standing on the throne, all 1,000 people fell to the ground in absolute awe. The hype was unstoppable. The mountains literally shook as the crowd chanted her name, elevating her to the heavens:

"Look at her! The ageless savior! The cruel king has armies, but we have HER! She is not just a queen... she is a living Goddess dropped from the skies!"

Queen Quaritha looked at the worshipping crowd. She held out her hands, asking them to stand, and spoke softly but firmly:

"Please, do not call me a goddess. I am just Quaritha, your servant. I did not ask for this crown, but I promise you this: As long as I stand, the cruel king will never take our home. Tomorrow, we face his army!"

She denied her own divinity.

But her extreme humility only fueled their worship. At that exact second, an immortal legend was carved into history. The ageless ruler of Crysallune. QUEEN QUARTHA.

SCENE-2

Act I: The 160-Year Distortion

The Year: 2026.

For exactly 160 years, human history has been completely hijacked.

An unknown, criminal organization occupies the absolute peak of global power. How did they do it? Nobody knows. Why did it happen? No records exist. In a flash, the ultra-rich, the old governments, and the global elites were entirely stripped of their authority.

To control a broken world, the organization established an unshakeable pyramid of absolute fear:

- 1 King (The President): An existence whose face has never been seen.
- 5 Prime Ministers: The executioners of the King's will.
- Multiple Sub-Ministers: The middle tier of control.
- 1 Area Officer: Assigned to rule every single city zone.

This is the current reality. A world where crime is the law, and torture is the standard.

Act II: The Omen

On a routine morning, a single phone call shattered the peace of a top official.

Maanjin. Head of the Biology Department. A man standing at the pinnacle of modern science.

The voice on the receiver was trembling: “Sir... the bio-engineered falcon has escaped the laboratory.”

Rage consumed the scientist. That bird was not just an animal; it was a highly classified masterpiece of genetic manipulation. Maanjin rushed to the facility to inspect the damage himself.

[The Breach]

The heavy glass bridge inside the main lab was completely shattered from the inside out.

Following a trail of gray feathers, Maanjin walked out into the open air. That is when he saw it.

Sitting in the distance was a cat. Its eyes were wide, glaring with an unnatural, terrifying human-like expression. Clamped between its teeth was a folded piece of paper.

The cat dropped the paper onto the concrete, turned, and vanished into the brush like a phantom.

Maanjin picked up the note. The text was short, direct, and bleeding with confidence:

"NEXT TIME FOR SURE, YOUR GREATEST EXPERIMENT WILL BE STOLEN."

Maanjin's teeth ground together. He recognized the threat. He recognized the origin.

"I thought I destroyed them completely," Maanjin whispered, his eyes narrowing. "So, a few rats from the snow still live? Let them come. I will slaughter them all."

Instantly, Maanjin initiated Z+++ Security.

An army of elite soldiers, laser defense grids, and automated killing machines completely surrounded the laboratory. A trap was set.

Act III: The Infiltration

Deep inside a nearby forest of dense, black trees, the cat entered an abandoned, rotting house.

Beneath the floorboards lay a high-tech bunker consisting of exactly 5 hidden rooms. In the surveillance room, a man wearing a bizarre, smiling mask sat silently, watching the facility through hacked cameras.

The time had arrived.

A suspicious black van pulled up to the laboratory gates. The Z+++ security guards drew their weapons and rushed the vehicle. They threw the doors open.

Empty. A simple decoy.

[Stealth Infiltration: Initiated]

The masked man was already inside the facility. He didn't use doors; he moved through the ventilation network, perfectly calculating the blind spots of the motion sensors.

He dropped silently behind a guard. With a single movement, he jammed a hacking drive into the central power core.

The laser grids flickered out for exactly four seconds.

Four seconds was all he needed to cross the high-security corridor. He breached the final vault.

Inside the containment tank sat Maanjin's "Greatest Experiment."

It was a nightmare of biological distortion. A female form, completely ruined and rearranged:

- A wet, blinking human eye sat directly on a long tongue protruding from her mouth.
- A row of razor-sharp teeth lined her entire chest cavity.
- Her original, real face was twisted completely backward, staring blankly from her spine.

The masked man felt a pang of pure horror. He recognized the soul trapped inside this monster.

He slammed the emergency release. The glass shattered. The deformed creature unleashed a silent cry, unfolded two massive, leathery wings, and blasted through the ceiling, escaping into the night sky.

Act IV: The 1 vs 300 Calculation

ALARM BLARES! INTRUDER DETECTED IN THE VAULT!

The calculation was simple, yet suicidal:

1 Masked Man vs 300+ Elite Soldiers. 20 Armored Jeeps. 3 Attack Helicopters.

The masked man sprinted out of the facility as a massive hail of bullets tore the ground apart behind his heels. Spotlights cut through the darkness, tracking his position.

RATATATATATATA!

An armored jeep cut off his escape route. Without slowing down, the masked man slid directly underneath the moving chassis, planted a high-yield sticky bomb onto the fuel tank, and rolled out the other side.

BOOM!

A wall of fire erupted, blocking the path of the infantry. The masked man threw three high-density smoke grenades, completely blinding the thermal imaging of the helicopters above. He used the hood of a burning vehicle as a launchpad, cleared a 15-foot electric fence, and vanished into the pitch-black forest.

Act V: The Vow of Vengeance

The army didn't halt. Maanjin and his personal guard charged blindly into the thick fog of the woods.

Losing his mind to pure arrogance, Maanjin screamed into the empty trees:

"You are one of them, aren't you?! The survivors of Crysa! I burned your city to absolute ash! I crushed your people! You think you want revenge, hah?!"

Behind him, the junior scientists and soldiers froze in absolute terror. They whispered among themselves, their faces pale: "Crysa...? Did he just say Crysa? He actually destroyed that legendary empire...?"

Deep underground, inside the 5th room of the hidden base, the masked man sat in front of his monitors. He watched Maanjin screaming like a maniac in the woods.

Slowly, the man reached up and pulled off his smiling mask.

His face was cold, drenched in sweat and silent tears. He stared directly at Maanjin's face on the screen and spoke in a low, chilling whisper:

"You are the one who turned my beautiful queen into that disgusting monster. You are the one who destroyed my kingdom. We helped you... and you betrayed us."

He gripped his mask until his knuckles turned pure white.

"I will avenge my queen. I will kill you, Maanjin."

What truly happened between these two men?

How did a single human scientist destroy the grand, immortal kingdom of Crysallune?

The dark truth will be revealed later.

SCENE-3

ACT 1: THE FAULT IN THE DIMENSION

Part 1: The Ash of Pyroth

The War of the Mountains had ended.

The absolute victor was Queen Quartha.

The cruel King Jarin, a tyrant who had crushed countless nations under his iron boot, was dead. His legendary empire, Pyroth, was left entirely headless, bleeding, and empty. By all laws of conquest, Pyroth belonged to Quartha. The world waited for her to claim it.

But an anomaly occurred.

Queen Quartha had absolutely no desire to occupy another nation's land. She did not want an empire built on blood. Instead of taking the throne, she did something that shocked the entire world.

She handed the entire kingdom of Pyroth to her most trusted friend and brother-in-arms—Rudra.

[The Coronation of a Friend]

Inside the burning gold halls of Pyroth, Quartha stood before Rudra. She did not wear a crown of greed; her white hair fell softly over her shoulders, and her red pupils were calm.

"This throne is yours, Rudra," Quartha said, her voice echoing through the massive stone chamber. "The people of Pyroth need a savior, not a conqueror. You have a good heart. Guide them."

Rudra looked at his hands, trembling. "Quartha... this is a massive burden. A whole kingdom. Why give it away? You fought the hardest. You bled the most."

Quartha smiled gently, a rare, soft expression on her warrior face.

"I fight to protect my people, Rudra, not to rule over others. Crysallune is my home. Take this crown. Let there be peace between our lands."

Rudra knelt before her, his loyalty forever sealed. Under his rule, Pyroth began to heal, running successfully and peacefully.

The war was over. The world was safe.

Or so they believed.

Part 2: The Ghostly Memories

Peace is a luxury. And for Queen Quartha, that luxury lasted exactly zero seconds.

Immediately after the war, a brutal attack began. Not from an army. Not from an enemy king. The attack was happening entirely inside Quartha's own mind.

Every single night, the moment she closed her eyes, she was hit by terrifyingly vivid, strange dreams.

She was completely unmarried. She had never known the touch of love. Yet, in these dreams, she was experiencing the deep, intense memories of a man. She could feel his warmth. She could hear his laugh. She could feel the crushing weight of his embrace.

[The Phenomenon: Temporal Bleeding]

It was not a dream. It was a physical delivery of memories. A direct link to her future husband.

Quartha would wake up in the middle of the night, gasping for air, sweat dripping down her face. Her crimson eyes would scan her dark, empty royal bedroom in Crysallune.

"Who are you...?" she whispered into the dark, clutching her chest. Her heart was beating rapidly, aching for a man who did not yet exist in her world. "Why are you inside my head? Why do I love you when I don't even know your name?"

She could not comprehend it. A warrior who could master any weapon was completely powerless against the ghosts in her mind.

Part 3: The Call from the Higher Plane

As the weeks marched on, the dreams grew wider. They became louder. They became real.

The memories of the nameless man faded into the background, replaced by a massive, blinding white void. And inside that void, two figures appeared.

- The Figures: One man. One woman.
- The Features: Their hair was as blindingly white as the Himalayan frost. Their pupils were a sharp, burning crimson red.

They looked exactly like her.

They did not speak with their mouths. Their voices vibrated directly into Quartha's soul, repeating the same heavy, painful words every single night:

"Come back home, Quartha. The cage is cracking. You do not belong there. Come back home."

Quartha tried to run from them in the dream, but in a white void, there is nowhere to hide. "Where is home?! Who are you people?!" she screamed.

Then, the final seal in her mind shattered.

[Absolute Realization]

The human brain is a 3rd-dimensional organ. It is entirely incapable of perceiving the true shape of reality.

But Quartha was never human.

In a flash of blinding light, 1,000 years of amnesia dissolved. She remembered everything.

She did not belong to the Earth. She did not belong to this universe. She was a native entity of the 5th Dimension. She was a high-ranking Knight, the elite daughter of one of the 5th-dimensional King's grand ministers.

And the two people in her dreams? They were her closest friends, her fellow knights from the higher plane.

Part 4: The 5th-Dimensional Standoff

Locked inside her private royal chamber in Crysalline, Quartha sat cross-legged on the floor.

She closed her eyes, but she did not sleep. She forced her mind to break through the 3rd-dimensional barrier. Suddenly, the air in her room warped. The walls seemed to exist everywhere and nowhere at the same time.

The white-haired man and woman materialized right in front of her. They were stepping through a space that humans could not see.

"You finally remember us, Quartha," the female knight said, her voice cold but relieved. "You have been lost in this primitive, low-level world for far too long."

Quartha stood up slowly. Her posture had completely changed. The humble queen of Crysalline now possessed the terrifying, heavy aura of a cosmic knight.

"I remember," Quartha said softly. "I remember the 5th dimension. I remember the endless timelines. I can see it all again."

[The Traits of the 5th Dimension]

- Universal Sight: She could see all sides of a 3D object at once—including its solid interior.
- Spatial Distortion: She could appear and disappear from a human's perspective by simply moving through a direction humans cannot perceive.
- Time Manipulation: She could see multiple timelines existing at the exact same time, watching thousands of futures play out like open books.

The male knight stepped forward, his red eyes serious. "Then you know why you were sent here before your memory was erased. Your mission remains absolute. You must kill the child."

Quartha's heart dropped. "The child..."

"Yes," the female knight pressured, her voice sharp. "The child who is destined to be born tomorrow. If that child lives, the anchor will solidify. Our access to this dimension will be severed forever. You were our greatest, most ruthless warrior. You were proud, arrogant, and unyielding. Execute the target."

Quartha stood completely still.

If this had happened before her amnesia, she would have killed the child without a single thought. Back then, in the 5th dimension, she was cold, proud, and looked down on all lower life forms.

But 1,000 years as a human had changed her. Living with the villagers, watching them grow old, crying over their graves, and learning true humility had completely reshaped her soul. She was no longer that arrogant monster.

She looked at her two oldest friends, her red eyes burning with a new, fierce determination.

"No," Quartha said, her voice shaking the very fabric of the room. "I will not kill a child. My past self was blind. But this world has taught me what it means to protect life. I did not come to Earth to destroy that boy. I came to save him."

The two 5th-dimensional knights stepped back, their faces twisted in pure shock and anger.

"You have been corrupted by these insects!" the male knight yelled. "You are a knight of the higher plane! How dare you choose a primitive human over your own kind!"

"I am Queen Quartha of Crysallune!" she shouted back, stepping forward as her massive power pushed them backward into the spatial rift. "And no child will die on my watch. Leave this place, or I will erase you from this timeline myself!"

With a wave of her hand, she shattered the connection, forcing her friends back into the 5th dimension.

She was alone in her room again. She was breathing heavily. She looked out the window at the peaceful snowy mountains of her kingdom.

Tomorrow, a child would be born. A child she was supposed to murder. But instead, she was going to risk the wrath of the heavens to keep him alive.

The declaration was made.

The arrogant knight was dead. The protective queen was born.

The ultimate battle against her own destiny had just begun.

SCENE-3

ACT 2: THE INEVITABLE BOND

Part 1: The Cloak of Snow

The outside world was changing. And change is always violent.

Years passed after Pyroth was given to Rudra. But mortal kings do not live forever. When the first King Rudra finally passed away, the outside human government saw their chance. They marched in with modern weapons and occupied the kingdom of Pyroth.

The bloodline of Rudra was hunted. To survive, his great-great-great-grandchild fled into the freezing cold of the Himalayas, carrying his pregnant wife. They were seeking a myth. They were seeking Crysallune.

But from the outside world's perspective... Crysallune did not exist.

[Absolute Isolation: The Divine Shield]

Using her 5th-dimensional spatial distortion, Queen Quartha had completely removed the geometry of her kingdom from the 3rd-dimensional world.

To a regular human, a satellite, or an army, there was nothing but endless, empty snow and killer blizzards. Crysallune was hidden perfectly, like a city of ghosts.

Only those allowed by Quartha could cross the invisible border. The freezing, exhausted descendants of Rudra stumbled through the hidden gates. They fell into the warm streets of Crysallune, saved by the queen who had blessed their ancestor a century ago.

They took shelter. And inside that sanctuary, a child was preparing to be born.

Part 2: The Knight of All Timelines

But before the child could draw its first breath, another absolute truth had to be answered.

Among the high warriors of Crysallune stood one man who surpassed everyone.
Enaya.

He was a warrior of legendary status. Handsome, brave, and possessing a strength that bordered on monstrous. For decades, he had stood by Quartha's side as her absolute shield. He loved her. Not as a subject loves a queen, but as a man loves a woman. He had never spoken of it, keeping his feelings locked deep within his chest out of respect for her crown.

But Quartha now possessed her 5th-dimensional sight.

When she looked at Enaya, she didn't just see one man standing in the snow.

[The Vision: Multi-Timeline Convergence]

In one timeline, they were warriors who died together. In another, they were lovers in a peaceful world. In every single existing future and past, Enaya was her husband.

One night, on the highest balcony of the palace, the wind was howling. Quartha stood alone, watching the falling snow. Enaya walked up silently, his heavy cloak snapping in the wind, and stood exactly three steps behind her.

"You should be inside, My Queen," Enaya said, his voice deep and comforting.
"The storm tonight is heavy."

Quartha did not turn around. "Enaya. Tell me the truth. How long have you loved me?"

Enaya froze. The bravest warrior in the world was suddenly terrified by a single question. He looked down, his knuckles tightening. "Since the day I was old enough to understand what a hero is. But I am your soldier, Quartha. Your safety is my only right."

Quartha slowly turned to face him. Her crimson eyes were soft, reflecting the moonlight.

"Step forward," she commanded gently.

Enaya took three steps, closing the distance. Quartha reached out and placed her hand against his cheek. Her touch was warm.

"I have looked through ten thousand timelines, Enaya," Quartha whispered, her voice trembling with a deep, hidden emotion. "I have seen worlds where the stars die, and worlds where empires crumble to dust. But in every single reality... I find you. And in every single reality, you choose to love me."

Enaya's eyes widened. He could feel the cosmic weight of her words, but he did not care about the dimensions. He only cared about the woman standing before him. He wrapped his massive, scarred hands around her waist, pulling her close.

"I don't care about other timelines, Quartha," Enaya said, looking directly into her red pupils. "I only have this one life. And in this life, I swear to love you until my heart stops beating. I don't care if you are a queen or a goddess from another world. You are my home."

Tears, hot and real, slipped down Quartha's face. The proud, cold knight of the 5th dimension was completely melted by the pure, unyielding love of a 3rd-dimensional human.

That night, beneath the canopy of an invisible kingdom, Queen Quartha and Enaya were married. It was not a political union. It was a bonding of two souls that destiny could never tear apart.

Part 3: The Birth and The Tragedy

The very next day, a cry echoed through the royal medical halls.

The child of Rudra's bloodline was born. They named him Rudra, honoring the great king of old. Quartha stood over the crib, her hand resting on Enaya's shoulder. She looked at the tiny baby. This was the child her people from the higher plane wanted her to murder.

Instead, she smiled. She had protected him.

For eight years, life in Crysalline was beautiful. Little Rudra grew up under the peaceful sun of the hidden kingdom. But the 3rd dimension is a place of fragile bodies and sudden endings.

At the age of eight, a terrible sickness swept through the lower sectors of the city. Despite all the advanced technology and medicine Quartha possessed, some human cells were too weak. In a matter of weeks, little Rudra's parents passed away, leaving the young boy entirely alone in a massive, cold world.

Young Rudra sat on the steps of his empty home, crying into his small hands.

A shadow fell over him. He looked up through his tears. Enaya and Queen Quartha were standing there. Enaya knelt down in the dirt, wiping the boy's tears with his thumb.

"You are not alone, little one," Enaya said softly, his voice firm like a rock. "Your father was a brother to this kingdom. From this day on, you walk with us. You are my son now."

Quartha stepped forward, wrapping her arms around both of them.

[The New Family: Formed]

Part 4: The Triangle of Three Souls

Young Rudra was brought into the royal palace. The bond that formed between these three individuals was nothing short of beautiful.

Enaya was a strict but deeply loving father. He taught Rudra how to hold a sword, how to brace his body against a strike, and how to survive in the wild snow. Quartha became his mother and his teacher. She opened the grand archives of Crysallune to him, teaching him science, strategy, and advanced technology that no human mind had ever processed.

Rudra was an absolute prodigy.

- Age 10: He mastered the advanced combat styles of Enaya, out-stripping elite soldiers in speed.
- Age 12: He could rebuild the complex energy cores that powered the city's invisible shield.
- Age 13: His mind worked like a supercomputer, absorbing intelligence at a terrifying pace.

Every evening, after a hard day of training, the three of them would sit by the grand fireplace in the palace. Rudra would rest his head against Quartha's knee while she brushed his hair, and Enaya would laugh, polishing his sword by the fire.

"Mom," young Rudra asked one night, looking up at Quartha. "Why do you train me so hard? I'm only thirteen."

Quartha stopped brushing his hair. She looked into the dancing flames, her crimson eyes serious.

"Because, Rudra, the world outside these mountains is covered in darkness," she said softly. "One day, the shield might fall. And when that day comes, you must be strong enough to protect the people you love. Your father and I are strong... but your potential is limitless."

Enaya smiled, placing a heavy hand on the boy's shoulder. "She's right, son. You have the blood of kings in you. Never forget that."

Rudra nodded fiercely, his young heart swelling with pride and love for his adopted parents. He loved them more than life itself.

It was a perfect, beautiful life.

But the universe does not allow perfection to last.

A single drop of poison was about to enter the hidden paradise.

SCENE-3

ACT 3: THE SEED OF MALICE

Part 1: History Repeats with Blood

History loves to repeat itself.

But it never repeats itself with kindness.

One chilly morning, deep within the snowy woods of Crysallune, a random old man was collecting firewood. The kingdom was peaceful. The sky was clear. Suddenly, the old man stumbled upon a body lying in the deep drifts.

It was a middle-aged man, unconscious, freezing to death.

Just like the old elder who had saved Quarthia one thousand years ago, this kind old citizen did not hesitate. He picked up the heavy stranger, carried him through the snow, and brought him into his warm home. He gave him food. He gave him shelter.

But the woman found in the snow a thousand years ago was a savior.

The man found in the snow today was a virus.

[The Intruder: Profile]

He was not a lost traveler. He was a high-ranking operative of the Great Criminal Organization that ruled the outside world. And he possessed a dangerous, psychological obsession with advanced technology.

When the middle-aged man opened his eyes, he did not panic. He did not cry. He looked around the old man's hut and noticed the advanced energy heating systems, the strange metal alloys, and the clean, impossible machinery powering the small home.

His eyes widened with absolute greed. He realized he had accidentally crossed into a hidden world of infinite power. He wanted to steal all of it.

Part 2: The First Betrayal

For three days, the stranger pretended to be weak and grateful. He stayed in the hut, secretly studying the village. He realized the most important secret of Crysallune:

To enter or exit this hidden kingdom through the invisible spatial wall, a person had to wear a specific device. The Bracelet. It was a masterwork of 5th-dimensional stabilization created by Queen Quarthia herself so her citizens could walk through the barrier safely.

Without a bracelet, a human would be crushed by the spatial folds or lost in the endless blizzard forever.

On the fourth night, while the kind old man was sleeping peacefully, the stranger stood over his bed. His face was completely cold. He held a heavy stone tool in his hand.

CRACK.

Blood splattered across the wooden wall. The stranger murdered his savior in cold blood. He reached down to the dead old man's wrist, unclipped the shining silver bracelet, and fastened it to his own arm.

He ran into the storm. He raised the bracelet. The invisible space parted for him, and he escaped into the outside world.

[The Reaction: Crysallune]

The next morning, the old man's body was found. The news spread like a wildfire across the 1,000 citizens of Crysallune. Shock turned into deep sorrow, and then into worry.

Inside the palace, King Enaya stood up, his hand gripping his sword. "A traveler murdered one of our elders and stole a transit bracelet. This is an act of war, Quartha."

Quartha looked down from her throne. Her red eyes were deep with thought.

"The citizens think he did it out of pure fear," Quartha said softly. "They believe a primitive outsider panicked and stole the key to escape our mountains. But my sight tells me otherwise. The fabric of our isolation has been scratched. Enaya, double the border guards. Prepare the defenses. We do not take chances."

Part 3: The Failure of the Copy

The thief arrived at the absolute headquarters of the Great Criminal Organization. He stood before the highest authorities—the Prime Ministers. He showed them the bracelet. He told them about an invisible kingdom filled with technology that could make them gods.

The organization was mesmerized. They poured millions of dollars into his hands.

Using the stolen bracelet, the thief built hundreds of duplicate copies. He was proud. He was confident. He led a strike force of 500+ elite soldiers up the Himalayan peaks, directly to the coordinates of the hidden gates.

"Watch closely," the thief laughed, raising his duplicate bracelet toward the empty air. "The wealth of a god is ours!"

He clicked the button.

[The Result: Absolute Rejection]

3rd-dimensional science cannot replicate 5th-dimensional geometry.
The copy was a dead piece of plastic.

Nothing happened. The air remained solid. The gates did not open.

The thief tried again and again, sweat pouring down his face. Click. Click. Click.
The space refused to move. The 500 soldiers stood in the freezing cold, realizing they had been fooled.

The Great Criminal Organization does not tolerate failure. They especially do not tolerate the wasting of government money.

The thief was dragged back to the capital in heavy chains. He begged for his life, but his cries meant nothing. He was thrown into a dark, concrete execution chamber and shot directly through the skull.

His body was dumped in an unmarked grave.

The thief was dead. But his bloodline was not.

Part 4: Seven Years of Pure Malice

The executed thief left behind a teenage son.

Maanjin.

Maanjin did not cry for his father's death. He did not care about his father's morality. But Maanjin possessed two things that made him a monster: his father's genius scientific mind, and a burning, unyielding hatred for the kingdom that caused his family's ruin.

"Crysalune," Maanjin whispered, looking at his father's failed engineering notes.
"You killed my father. You humiliated my name. I will tear your invisible walls down with my bare hands."

[The Training Arc of a Madman]

For exactly seven years, Maanjin locked himself inside a dark, private laboratory. He did not sleep more than three hours a night. He went entirely insane, forcing his brain to comprehend the residual spatial energy left on his father's papers.

Seven years of failure. Seven years of madness.

Until finally... Hummm.

A perfect, vibrating frequency erupted from the metal on his desk. He had done it. He had built a true, working replica of Queen Quatha's bracelet.

Maanjin stood before the high leaders of the Criminal Organization. He was older now, his face sharp and cruel. "Give me a massive army," Maanjin demanded. "If my replica fails, you can execute me on the spot just like my father. But if it works... we take the crown of the world."

The leaders agreed to the ultimate gamble.

Part 5: The Shattered Gates

A massive, terrifying army stood before the empty, frozen valley of the Himalayas. Hundreds of armored vehicles, heavy tanks, and thousands of heavily armed soldiers lined the white plains.

At the front of the army stood Maanjin. He looked at the empty air ahead of him. He smiled a twisted, disgusting smile.

He raised his replica bracelet. He pressed the core switch.

[The Fracture]

CRACK!

A sound like thunder shook the entire mountain range. The empty space ahead of them began to ripple like water. Then, like a mirror shattering into a million pieces, the spatial distortion dissolved.

The invisible shield fell.

For the first time in a century, the royal kingdom of Crysalune was exposed to the brutal eyes of the outside world.

The thousands of soldiers gasped in absolute shock. Standing before them was a city of pure, shining silver towers, floating energy platforms, and breathtaking, impossible beauty. It looked like a kingdom of gods dropped into the snow.

Maanjin's eyes burned with a sickening, triumphant joy. He drew his weapon and pointed it directly at the heart of the beautiful city.

"The gates are open!" Maanjin roared, his voice carrying across the entire valley. "Move in! Slaughter anyone who resists, and bring me their technology! Today, we erase Crysalune from history!"

Inside the city, the red emergency sirens began to blare.
The peace was gone.

The ultimate tragedy of Queen Quaritha had officially arrived.

SCENE-3

ACT 4: THE THIRTY-DAY ASHES

Part 1: The Broken Shield

The red sirens did not just ring. They screamed.

Inside the royal palace of Crysallune, the atmosphere was thick with panic. For the first time in history, trespassers had breached the spatial wall. An army was inside the paradise.

In the royal armory, King Enaya stood trembling. His hands, which once held a massive sword without shaking, were weak. A terrible, dark lung sickness had been eating away at his body for months. He coughed violently, blood staining his palm.

Yet, he was forcing his heavy steel armor onto his fragile body.

"Enaya! Stop!" Queen Quartha rushed into the room. Her crimson eyes were wide with panic. She grabbed his armor plates, trying to pull them away. "Your body is failing you! You cannot fight like this! Stay in the palace!"

Enaya turned around. Even while dying from sickness, his eyes held the unyielding spirit of a king. He gently took Quartha's hands into his own.

"Quartha... look at me," Enaya spoke, his voice raspy and deep. "You told me that I am your husband in every timeline. If that is true, then I have died protecting you ten thousand times before. I will not change that destiny today. I will not hide while an evil army marches toward my wife."

Quartha's heart shattered. She was a being from a higher plane, but in this moment, she was just a terrified wife begging for her husband's life. Before she could speak, Enaya drew his legendary sword. He walked past her, out into the freezing wind.

Part 2: The Clash of Eras

The battle that followed was an absolute slaughterhouse.

[The Conflict: Modern Warfare vs Ancestral Might]

Crysalune possessed incredible technology and master sword fighters. But Maanjin possessed something far more chaotic: an infinite number of bullets, heavy tanks, and zero mercy.

The war did not end in a day. It did not end in a week.

For thirty brutal days, the mountains of Crysalune burned. The beautiful silver towers were blown apart by missile strikes. The clean, floating energy platforms crashed into the streets, covered in ash.

It was a nightmare where guns and bullets stopped the ancient mastery of the sword. Every single day, Crysalune lost more warriors. The snow turned from pure white to a sickening, permanent red.

Part 3: The Death of a King

On the thirty-first day, the enemy forces breached the palace gates.

Enaya stood alone on the grand stone stairs, surrounded by a hundred enemy soldiers. His body was completely broken. His sickness was choking him from the inside, and multiple bullet wounds were bleeding through his armor. Yet, he refused to fall. He swung his sword like a demon, protecting the inner chamber where Quartha and young Rudra were waiting.

BANG! BANG! BANG!

Three heavy rifle bullets pierced directly through Enaya's chest.

His sword clattered onto the stone. His knees buckled.

Quartha blew the heavy doors open, rushing out onto the balcony. Her eyes locked onto her husband's falling body. Time seemed to slow to an absolute crawl. She caught him in her arms before he hit the cold ground.

"Enaya! No! Stay with me!" Quartha screamed, her voice cracking with an agony she had never felt in a thousand years of existence. She pressed her hands against his bleeding chest, trying to force her energy into his body.

Enaya looked up at her one last time. He didn't look at the blood, or the army, or the ruined kingdom. He only looked at her face. He smiled, a soft, beautiful expression.

"I kept my promise, Quartha..." Enaya whispered, his breath fading into the freezing air. "I protected you... in this life. Take care of... our boy..."

His eyes grew blank. His hand fell limp against the snow.

King Enaya was dead.

The greatest warrior of the mountains had closed his eyes forever.

Part 4: The Cruel Checkmate

"NOOOOOOOOO!"

Quartha's scream shook the entire mountain range. Her white hair whipped wildly in the storm as her crimson eyes turned completely dark with pure, demonic rage. The 5th-dimensional energy inside her began to boil. She was ready to tear the space apart and erase the entire army from reality.

"I wouldn't do that if I were you, Your Majesty!"

A cold, mocking voice echoed through the courtyard. Maanjin walked out from the smoke, flanked by dozens of soldiers.

In the center of his squad, two soldiers were dragging a thirteen-year-old boy. Rudra. He was beaten, covered in bruises, and a heavy pistol was pressed firmly against his temple. Behind him, the remaining hundreds of innocent Crysalline citizens were lined up, surrounded by machine guns.

Maanjin smiled a disgusting, triumphant smile.

"The moment you use your strange magic, my men press the triggers," Maanjin laughed, pointing at Rudra and the citizens. "Your adopted son's brains will paint this snow. Every single one of your precious citizens will turn into a corpse. So, what is it going to be, Goddess? Will you fight us... or will you save them?"

Rudra looked up at Quartha through his swollen eyes, tears streaming down his face. "Mom! Don't listen to him! Fight! Destroy them!"

But Quartha couldn't do it.

Part 5: The Ultimate Sacrifice

[The Restriction: Spatial Backlash]

Queen Quartha possessed the power to destroy the entire army. However, her 5th-dimensional abilities were too heavy for a 3rd-dimensional space. If she unleashed her full cosmic strength inside the valley, the entire space would collapse. The mountain would fold into itself, instantly killing Rudra and every single citizen she loved.

She was completely trapped. Her power was useless against the simple, cruel leverage of human malice.

She looked at her dead husband lying in her lap. She looked at her crying son with a gun to his head. She looked at her helpless people.

The proud, immortal knight of the higher plane made her final choice.

Slowly, the glowing purple energy around her body faded away. She dropped her strength down, completely suppressing her powers until she was at the level of a normal, fragile human. She held her hands up, letting her head fall in total defeat.

"Stop," Quartha said, her voice completely dead, devoid of all hope.
"Do not hurt the boy. Do not hurt my people. I surrender. Take me."

Maanjin's eyes flashed with a sickening, evil joy. He had done what his father could never do. He had brought a goddess to her knees.

"Tie her up in heavy chains!" Maanjin roared. "The kingdom of Crysallune belongs to us!"

The crown had fallen.

The queen was captured.

And the final act of this tragedy was about to begin.

SCENE-3

ACT 5: THE VALLEY OF BONES

Part 1: The Broken Promise

Surrender is an agreement based on trust.

But to a monster, trust is just a weakness to exploit.

Queen Quartha stood in heavy iron chains, her powers completely turned off to keep the people safe. She had given up her freedom so her son, Rudra, and her 1,000 citizens could live.

Maanjin looked at the captured queen, then looked back at his army. A disgusting, cold smile appeared on his face. He raised his hand and dropped it.

"Kill them all," Maanjin said casually.

RATATATATATATA!

The soldiers did not hesitate. Heavy machine guns opened fire on the lined-up citizens. Screams echoed through the valley. Men, women, and children fell into the snow, their blood turning the white ground into a lake of red.

"NO!" Quartha screamed, her body shaking the chains. "You promised! You gave your word!"

"I lied," Maanjin laughed, watching the massacre. "Why would I leave a whole kingdom of advanced humans alive? It is a waste of time."

Part 2: The Emergency Leap

In that exact second of absolute despair, Queen Quartha made a calculation.

She could not save her people. But she would save her son.

With a sudden burst of physical strength, Quartha ripped her right arm free from the heavy iron cuff. She did not use her magic to fight. Instead, she tore the silver bracelet off her own wrist and threw it across the courtyard.

The bracelet flew through the air, landing perfectly in the hands of thirteen-year-old Rudra.

"Rudra! Touch the core!" Quartha screamed with the last of her voice.

Rudra, crying and covered in dust, instinctively pressed his fingers against the glowing center of the bracelet.

[5th-Dimensional Escape: Active]

The device did not just move him across space. It warped his body through a fold in time, tearing him out of the 3rd-dimensional plane entirely.

FLASH.

A blinding light swallowed Rudra. The soldier holding the pistol to his head shot at empty air. Rudra was gone, transferred safely to a completely different location far away from the mountains.

Maanjin ran over to the spot where the boy was standing, his face twisted in rage. He looked back at Quartha, who was laughing through her tears.

"The boy is gone, Maanjin," Quartha whispered, her crimson eyes burning with absolute spite. "You can never catch him."

Maanjin walked up and struck her across the face, sending her to the ground. He looked at her white hair and her unnatural red eyes.

"It doesn't matter," Maanjin said, his breathing heavy with greed. "Look at her. She just warped space with a piece of metal. She has real superpowers. Wrap her in heavy medical sheets. She is the perfect subject for our dream experiment."

Part 3: The Ghost in the Lab

Rudra woke up in a dark, empty forest on the edge of the outside world. He was thirteen, completely alone, and his entire world had just been burned to ash.

But he did not run away. The training from King Enaya and Queen Quarthia had made him a warrior.

Moving like a ghost, Rudra used his advanced stealth skills to follow the tracks of Maanjin's military trucks. For days, he moved through the shadows, completely unnoticed by the soldiers. He followed them all the way to a massive, hidden high-tech research facility in the city.

He found a way inside through the heavy ventilation shafts. He crawled through the cold metal pipes until he reached the glass ceiling of the main biology lab.

He looked down. And his young heart completely broke.

[The Horror of Science]

Below him, Queen Quarthia was strapped to a cold, metal operating table. She was not being treated like a queen. She was being treated like a lab rat.

Maanjin and his team of scientists were torturing her to death. They were systematically cutting her body apart, removing her internal organs and body parts. They were trying to inject her 5th-dimensional cells into the bodies of their supreme leaders to steal her cosmic power.

Quartha was crying out in supreme, unbearable pain, yelling for them to stop. But the scientists just laughed, taking notes as blood spilled onto the clean floor.

Tears of pure hatred poured down Rudra's face. He gripped his fists until his nails cut into his palms, drawing blood. He pulled out a small knife, ready to drop down from the ceiling and kill everyone in the room to free his mother.

Suddenly, a voice echoed inside his brain. It was her inner voice, speaking directly to his mind.

“Don't, Rudra... Stay where you are.”

Rudra froze. He looked through the glass. Quartha's twisted face was looking slightly toward the ceiling. She knew he was there.

“They are too many. If you drop down, they will kill you too. You must live. You must survive. Go to the storage room next door... save my pet. Save the cat.”

Rudra's mind raced. The cat?

He remembered. Years ago, the original Elder Rudra had brought a special cat back as a gift for Quartha after his military campaign in Egypt. Elder Rudra had told her: "This cat is not a normal animal. In Egypt, this creature is a king."

“Take the cat, Rudra. Run away. Train until you are strong enough. I love you, my son.”

The voice in his head faded away into a painful scream as the scientists used a machine on her brain.

Rudra let out a silent, choking sob. He backed away into the dark ventilation pipes. He broke into the storage room, found the strange, wide-eyed cat locked in a metal cage, and broke it open. The cat jumped into his arms, its eyes staring into his soul.

Together, the boy and the cat escaped into the night.

Part 4: The Valley of Death

Rudra traveled back to the mountains of Crysallune, hoping against hope that someone had survived.

When he crossed the border and entered the hidden valley, the sight crushed whatever was left of his soul.

The beautiful, advanced silver kingdom of Crysallune was gone. The towers were broken rubble. The clean streets were completely covered in ash and dust. There was no life here.

The entire paradise was now a massive, silent valley of human bones.

Rudra walked through the ruins, his feet crunching on the ash. He walked up to the stairs of the royal palace. There, lying on the stone step where he had fallen, was a skeleton.

It was his adopted father. King Enaya was now just a pile of white bones, his legendary sword rusted and broken next to him.

[Absolute Despair]

Rudra fell to his knees in front of his father's bones. He grabbed the dust and screamed into the empty sky until his throat bled. His mother was a lab rat. His father was dust. His kingdom was dead.

The cat walked up slowly, rubbing its head against Rudra's trembling shoulder.

Rudra stopped crying. The sorrow inside his eyes completely died, replaced by a cold, dark, and terrifying void of pure hatred. He stood up straight, looking out over the graves of his people.

"They think they won," Rudra spoke, his voice no longer sounding like a thirteen-year-old boy. It sounded like an executioner. "They think Crysallune is dead."

He picked up the cat, placing it on his shoulder. He looked down at his father's broken sword.

"I will learn their ways. I will learn their world. I will train until my body becomes a weapon that can tear their entire government to pieces. Maanjin... I am coming for you."

For years, the boy vanished from the world.

He lived in the shadows of the outside world, training his body, mind, and spirit to their absolute limits.

When he finally returned to the light, he no longer wore the face of the young prince of Crysallune.

He wore a funny, smiling mask.

CUT TO PRESENT ERA: 2026.

The hunt has officially begun.

SCENE-4

ACT 1: THE VOW OF THE SMILING MASK

Part 1: The Final Alignment

The Present Day. 2026.

Inside the underground surveillance bunker, the air was cold, smelling of stale iron and old concrete.

Rudra stood completely still in front of the wall of flashing monitors. The screens lit up his plastic, smiling mask with a pale, blue glow. On the cameras, a terrifying sight was unfolding: the forest was crawling with lights. Maanjin's army of one thousand elite soldiers and heavy research workers had entered the dark woods, spreading out to hunt him down.

Slowly, Rudra turned his head backward. His eyes, hidden behind the dark holes of the mask, filled with a deep, crushing emotion.

In the corner of the room sat the glass containment cage. Inside it was the mutated, grotesque form of Queen Quaritha. Her dislocated body was quiet, but her wet, blinking eye on her tongue looked directly at him. She was watching her adopted son.

Rudra's fists tightened until his knuckles cracked like breaking wood.

"I will avenge you, my queen," Rudra whispered. His voice was low, heavy, and dripping with seven years of unspent hatred. "I will tear down everything he built. I promise you."

Part 2: The Command to the King

Rudra turned his gaze toward the floor. Sitting on top of a metal desk was the wide-eyed Egyptian cat. Its golden eyes reflected the security screens, entirely calm in the face of an impending massacre.

Rudra walked over and knelt in front of the animal.

"Moon," Rudra spoke softly, using the cat's true name. "You have to help me out today. Without you... I could never have made it this far. The final hour is here. Let's finish this together."

[The Contract of Silence]

The cat did not meow. It did not make a sound. Instead, it slowly bowed its head, a deliberate, highly intelligent nod that sealed their pact. Moon stood up, its claws sliding out from its paws, clicking against the metal table.

Outside, the march of one thousand boots grew closer. Maanjin's forces were closing the net. The execution of the final battle was officially initialized.

Part 3: The Unseen Executioner

Deep within the dark forest, Maanjin's army was moving like a massive, armored snake.

Soldiers carrying high-intensity searchlights cut through the thick fog. Behind them, heavy science personnel from the Biology Department tracked biological energy signatures on their handheld tablets.

"Spread out!" a commander shouted. "Check every bush! The intruder is within two hundred meters of our current position!"

Then, without a single sound, the snake was bitten.

SPLAT.

A vanguard soldier suddenly fell face-first into the mud. He didn't scream. He didn't struggle. When the soldier next to him turned the light down, his heart stopped breathing.

Directly through the center of the soldier's heavy titanium chest plate was a clean, perfect hole. His heart had been completely punched out of his body from behind.

"Sniper!" the commander yelled, raising his rifle. "We have an active sniper in the trees! Take cover!"

Before the squad could move, another soldier dropped. Splat. A hole opened through his neck. Then another. Splat. A hole ripped through a soldier's skull.

[The Visual Paradox]

The security cameras inside Rudra's bunker caught the entire sequence. On the screens, soldiers were falling down randomly like dominoes. There was no sound of gunpowder. There was no flash of light. Only bodies hitting the dirt, pierced by an invisible force.

Rudra watched the monitor, his eyes widening behind his mask. Even he was shocked. He had not set any traps in that sector of the woods.

"What... what is killing them?" Rudra muttered, leaning closer to the glass screen.

The forest was turning into an immediate graveyard. Out of the ongoing force, the first one hundred soldiers were completely wiped out within minutes, their blood painting the dark trees.

The army was in total, horrifying panic. And then, the killer finally slowed down enough to be seen.

ACT 2: THE MANIFESTATION OF "DANGER"

Part 1: The Relic of Regeneration

From the ashes of the slaughtered vanguard, a shadow dropped from the sky.

It landed on top of a pile of dead soldiers, tearing its talons into a tactical helmet. It was a falcon. But it was an absolute nightmare of modern biological engineering.

Its feathers were as hard as steel needles, and its eyes burned with a sickening, glowing red energy.

This was Danger.

[Project: Danger — Technical Specifications]

- Origin: The one and only successful lab animal created by Maanjin's team using the stolen biological samples of Queen Quartha.
- The Power Source: 5th-dimensional cellular matrix.
- The Attribute: Absolute, infinite physical regeneration.

Maanjin, watching from his armored command van far behind the lines, saw the bird on his screen. He gasped, his face turning pale with a mixture of terror and obsession.

"The falcon..." Maanjin whispered, his hands shaking on the control panel. "It survived the escape. It didn't just run... it became a god."

Danger was the ultimate elevation of Quartha's stolen life force. It did not fight like an animal. It fought like a localized natural disaster.

Part 2: The Carnage of Bones

The remaining soldiers opened fire on the bird. Thousands of high-velocity bullets tore through the air, ripping Danger's body to shreds. His wings were broken, his beak was shattered, and his chest was turned into liquid meat.

But the laws of physics did not apply to Danger.

SHUUUUUU.

In a fraction of a millisecond, a violent purple steam erupted from the bird's wounds. Before the empty bullet casings could even hit the ground, his wings snapped back together. His shattered beak reformed into a razor-sharp point.

Danger let out a screech that shattered the glass windows of the military jeeps.

He launched himself forward at supersonic speed. The speed was so intense that the air pressure broke the bird's own nose and facial bones upon acceleration. But as he flew, his face regenerated instantly, only to break again from the sheer force of his own momentum.

[The Loop of Violence]

Accelerate ->Face breaks from speed ->Kills target ->Regenerates instantly -> Repeat.

It was an absolute, beautiful carnage. Danger tore through the forest like a flying buzzsaw. He punched through soldiers' skulls, snapped necks with his wings, and ripped entire arms off the bodies of the scientists.

Inside the underground bunker, Rudra stared at the screen in complete confusion.

"Why... why is that monster helping us?" Rudra muttered.

The bird was killing Maanjin's men without mercy. But the army was too massive. While a small group of scientists and three hundred soldiers stayed behind to fight the terrifying falcon, the main force of the army—four hundred heavily armed soldiers—bypassed the slaughter.

They had found the rotting wooden house. They were at the front door.

ACT 3: THE VULCAN OF CRYNALUNE

Part 1: The Covered Shroud

The front door of the surface house was gone. The fog rolled into the empty hall.

Rudra stood alone at the end of the long, narrow corridor. He was completely silent, his hands resting on a massive, heavy object that was entirely covered by a thick, dust-covered black tarp.

The hallway began to fill with men. Dozens of elite soldiers rushed through the entrance, their heavy tactical shields locked together to form an iron wall. Behind them, more soldiers pointed their assault rifles directly at Rudra's chest.

"Target sighted!" a soldier yelled through his radio. "He's trapped in the hall! He has nowhere to run! Take him down!"

Rudra looked at the army of guns pointed at his face. Slowly, calmly, he grabbed the edge of the black tarp.

"You think your weapons represent the peak of human power," Rudra spoke, his voice echoing through the hollow house. "Let me show you the engineering of the kingdom you burned."

With a violent pull, he ripped the cover away.

Part 2: The Core Devastation

Standing in the hallway was a weapon that defied modern military logic.

[The Heritage: The Crysalune Heavy Vulcan]

- The Shield: A solid, glowing plate of energy alloy that covered Rudra's entire body from frontal attacks.
- The Core: A pulsing blue crystal battery salvaged from the old ruins of his home.
- The Mechanism: A six-barrel rotating cannon designed to fire high-density plasma-lead rounds.

Rudra flipped the main switch. HUMMMMMMM. The blue crystal battery flared to life, casting a brilliant, blinding light through the dark hallway. The six barrels began to rotate with a terrifying, high-pitched scream.

The soldiers' eyes widened in sudden, absolute horror.

"Get back! GET BA—"

BOOM! BOOM! BOOM! BOOM!

A wall of pure, unadulterated fire and lead erupted from the cannon. The sound was so loud that it instantly blew out the eardrums of every soldier in the front line.

The carnage was immediate and total. The high-density rounds did not just pierce the ballistic shields—they vaporized them. Armor plates, helmets, and human flesh were turned into a wet, red mist within seconds.

The hallway became a literal meat grinder. The soldiers behind could not run away because the entrance was packed with more men pushing forward. They were forced into the line of fire, their bodies shredded into pieces before they could even pull their triggers.

Part 3: Thirty Minutes of Lead

For thirty continuous minutes, Rudra did not release the triggers.

The empty gold shell casings rained onto the wooden floor like a metal waterfall, creating a massive pile around his boots. The walls of the hallway were completely painted in dark, thick human blood. The smell of burning gunpowder and scorched meat filled the entire house.

The house shook violently, the old wood groaning under the pressure of the infinite explosions.

Then, with a heavy, hollow click... the gun went silent.

Clack. Clack. Clack.

The blue crystal battery flickered and died. The barrels slowed down, smoking with intense, red-hot heat.

Rudra breathed heavily behind his mask. He looked down the hallway. Out of the 700 soldiers who had swarmed the house during the siege, 300 men lay dead in a horrific, solid pile of meat inside the corridor.

But the math of war was still cruel. 400 soldiers were still alive.

And Rudra's defense shield was completely broken, shattered by the constant impact of hundreds of return bullets. He was now entirely armorless.

Outside, the surviving 400 soldiers heard the gun stop. They let out a fierce, bloodthirsty roar.

"His weapon is dry! Move in! Kill him!"

Rudra dropped the heavy handles of the machine gun. He turned around, ripped open a hidden trapdoor in the floor, and dived into the dark basement below.

ACT 4: THE SUBTERRANEAN SPLIT

Part 1: The 5-Room Labyrinth

The underground bunker was a cold, concrete maze consisting of exactly five separate sectors.

[SECURITY ROOM] — (Central Core / Queen Quartha)

|

└─► [ARMORY] — (Rudra's Sector)

└─► [MEDICAL BAY] — (Moon's Sector)

└─► [TRAINING AREA] — (The Monster's Sector)

└─► [WATER RESERVOIR]

Rudra slammed the heavy iron trapdoor shut behind him and locked it with three steel bolts. He was bleeding from a stray graze on his shoulder, his breath ragged. He sprinted down the concrete hallway toward the Armory to find a backup weapon.

A few seconds later, the trapdoor above was blown apart by C4 charges.

Hundreds of soldiers poured down the ladder into the central corridor of the basement. The boots of four hundred men echoed against the concrete, creating a chaotic, terrifying noise.

The commander at the front stopped, looking at the heavy steel doors leading to the different sectors. "The target is hiding! We don't have time to search room by room! Divide the forces! Clear every sector simultaneously!"

[The Tactical Division of Force]

- The Armory: 100 elite soldiers breached the steel doors, tracking Rudra's blood trail.
- The Medical Bay: 50 soldiers marched in with flashlights, finding nothing but cabinets and a single cat.
- The Training Area: 50 soldiers entered the dark, echoing concrete room where the mutated queen was chained.
- The Surface Retreat: 200 soldiers, terrified by the machine gun carnage, broke rank and ran outside to reinforce Maanjin's scientist squad against the rampaging falcon.

The split was complete. The quiet underground bunker turned into four separate arenas of absolute, desperate violence. The final phase of the siege had begun.

ACT 5: THE SPREAD OF CARNAGE

Part 1: The Syringe of the King

Inside the dim, white-tiled Medical Bay, fifty soldiers moved slowly between the metal operating tables. Their gun barrels swept left and right.

"There's nothing here but medicine supplies," a soldier muttered. "Wait... look on the desk."

Sitting on top of a stainless-steel counter was the Egyptian cat, Moon. Its tail was perfectly still.

"It's just a stupid cat. Kill it." A soldier raised his boot to crush the animal.

FLASH.

The cat did not move like a normal feline. It vanished from the table in a blur of black fur that human eyes could not track.

"Where did it go—ARGH!"

The soldier fell to his knees, his hands clutching his face. Blood poured through his fingers. Moon had landed directly on his helmet, reached down, and slammed a heavy, ten-inch glass medical syringe directly through the soldier's left eye socket, driving it into his brain.

The other forty-nine soldiers opened fire in a blind panic. RATATATATA! The bullets shattered the glass cabinets, sending hundreds of chemical bottles crashing to the floor.

But the cat was a phantom. It utilized the medical environment with terrifying intelligence. It leaped from the top of a shelf, kicking a metal tray of surgical scalpels directly into the throats of two soldiers. It moved beneath the shadows of the tables, jabbing rusted needles into tendons and slashing arteries with impossible precision. It wasn't a fight; it was a silent, clean slaughter executed by an ancient king in a small body.

Part 2: The Horror in the Dark

Across the bunker, inside the massive, unlit Training Area, fifty soldiers walked into a room that felt like a refrigerator. The walls were stained with old claw marks.

"Keep your flashlights up," the squad leader whispered, sweat freezing on his forehead. "Something feels wrong."

A strange, wet sound echoed from the dark corner of the room. Slither. Slither.

A spotlight cut through the dark, illumination hitting the form of the mutated Queen Quarthia. When the soldiers saw her face, three men immediately dropped their weapons and began to vomit from pure, psychological horror.

[The Visual Abomination]

Her body parts were completely inverted. The wet, massive human eye on her long tongue was blinking rapidly, dripping saliva onto the floor.

Her chest cavity was wide open, lined with three rows of long, yellow teeth that were grinding together with a metallic sound. Her real, original face was on her back, staring at them with hollow, blood-red eyes.

"Fire! FIRE! KILL THAT THING!"

The soldiers screamed, firing their weapons in total terror. But the monster didn't feel pain. She let out a screech that sounded like a woman dying in a fire, launched her dislocated body forward, and tore into the squad.

It was pure horror-movie carnage. She didn't just kill; she ripped bodies apart with her bare hands, stuffing severed limbs into the teeth on her chest. The soldiers were completely broken mentally, shooting each other in the dark just to escape the room.

Part 3: One Versus One Hundred

Meanwhile, inside the Armory, Rudra was living through absolute hell.

One hundred soldiers had cornered him behind a row of heavy iron weapon racks. Rudra had no armor left. He was using salvaged Crysalline pistols and old explosive mines to fight a desperate guerrilla war.

BOOM!

An explosive mine detonated, blowing ten soldiers into the concrete wall. Rudra stepped out from the smoke, his medium-sized katana flashing in the dark. He severed a soldier's arm, spun around, and drove his blade through another man's throat.

But there were too many of them.

SLIFT.

A heavy combat knife pierced directly through the side of Rudra's stomach. He gasped, blood rushing into his mouth behind his mask. He grabbed the soldier's head, snapped his neck with a violent twist, and pulled the knife out of his own flesh, screaming in agony.

He was losing blood fast. His vision was blurring. Every single step felt like stepping on broken glass. But he refused to drop his sword. He continued to swing, painting the concrete floors of the armory with his own blood and the blood of his enemies.

By the time the last soldier fell dead at his feet, Rudra was a ghost. He had killed all one hundred men, but his body was completely ruined. He staggered out of the room, clutching his bleeding stomach, heading toward the Security Room.

ACT 6: THE CANNIBALISTIC DISASTER

Part 4: The Absorption of Divinity

Rudra stumbled into the central Security Room. He fell against the main control desk, his hands leaving thick, red prints on the buttons. He looked up at the main monitor that showed the outside forest.

What he saw froze the blood in his veins.

The rampaging falcon, Danger, lay on the ground. Its wings were broken beyond repair, pinned down by heavy, high-voltage titanium nets that Maanjin's remaining twenty scientists had deployed. The bird was struggling, its purple regeneration steam trying to heal its cells, but the nets were burning its feathers with constant electricity.

Maanjin walked out from his command vehicle. His face was completely twisted by madness and a sickening, desperate greed. He held a massive, heavy combat blade.

"You are my creation!" Maanjin screamed at the bird. "The power inside your blood belongs to me! I won't wait for a laboratory trial! I will take it now!"

With a violent swing, Maanjin decapitated the legendary falcon.

Then, before the eyes of his horrified scientists and the eyes of Rudra watching the screen, Maanjin did something completely demonic.

[The Taboo: Biological Assimilation]

Maanjin fell to his knees, grabbed the bleeding, raw corpse of the falcon, and began to eat it. He tore the meat with his teeth, swallowing the 5th-dimensional cellular tissue raw, letting the burning red blood pour down his chin.

"Sir! Stop! The cellular mutation hasn't been tested on humans! It will destroy your DNA!" a scientist screamed, trying to pull him away.

Maanjin backhanded the scientist, snapping his jaw instantly.

Suddenly, Maanjin's body began to warp. His veins turned a dark, glowing purple, bulging through his skin like thick ropes. He let out a roar of absolute pain and power as his human cells tore apart and rebuilt themselves at a molecular level. His fingernails turned into hard, black talons. His eyes turned into burning, blood-red circles.

The experiment was a success. A human had successfully absorbed the 5th-dimensional regeneration power.

Inside the security room, a cold drop of sweat ran down Rudra's neck. For the first time in his life, he felt a deep, suffocating fear toward Maanjin. The man was no longer a human scientist. He was a demon.

But next to him, the glass containment cage blew open.

The mutated Queen Quarthia monster had seen the screen. She recognized the man who had tortured her. With an instant, impossible speed that breached the 3rd-dimensional plane, her body vanished from the room, flying through the exit toward the forest to destroy her killer.

ACT 7: THE LAST SMILE OF THE QUEEN

Part 1: The Final Ambush

"Intruder in the core! Eliminate him!"

Before Rudra could react to the queen's departure, the heavy iron doors of the Security Room were kicked open. A fresh backup wave of 40 elite soldiers flooded the small room, their rifles raised.

Rudra was gravely wounded, clutching the knife strike in his stomach, his body shaking from blood loss. But he had no choice. He drew his katana with one hand, his back pressed against the surveillance desk.

"Die, you freak!"

The soldiers charged. Rudra lunged forward, his blade cutting through helmets and armor plates in a desperate, bleeding circle of steel. He was fighting for his life inside the room, but his eyes were permanently glued to the monitors on the wall.

He was watching his mother's final battle.

Part 2: The Battle of the Abominations

Outside, in the deep woods, the collision between the Demon Maanjin and the Mutated Queen Quartha was a total disaster for the earth.

The speed of their movements completely shattered the sound barrier, creating constant sonic booms that flattened the surrounding trees. They didn't fight like humans; they fought like wild, terrifying monsters.

Quartha slammed her dislocated limbs into Maanjin's chest, her opening cavity trying to chew his head off. Maanjin roared, his black talons tearing deep gouges into her white skin.

SHUUUU. SHUUUU.

Both of them were regenerating instantly. Every time Quartha ripped Maanjin's arm off, a new one erupted from his shoulder in a cloud of purple steam. Every time Maanjin snapped her neck, her head twisted back into place.

The sheer violence of their clash destroyed the entire ecosystem of the forest. The ground opened up into deep craters. Wild animals were crushed to death by the shockwaves. The air became hot, smelling of ozone, burning blood, and pure malice.

But Maanjin's human brain was fresh, while Quartha's body had been decaying from seven years of constant laboratory torture. Her regeneration cells began to slow down. Her movements became heavy.

Maanjin noticed the lag. He let out a sickening laugh, dove through her guard, and drove both of his taloned hands directly through her open chest cavity, ripping her biological core completely out of her body.

Part 3: The Telepathic Farewell

Inside the security room, Rudra cut the head off the last of the forty soldiers. He fell into a pool of blood, his breathing ragged, looking up at the screen.

On the monitor, Queen Quartha's massive body fell into the mud. The purple light in her eyes was fading away. She was closing her eyes for the last time.

Rudra's heart completely broke. An emotional storm hit his soul—a mixture of profound happiness because her seven years of torturous physical existence were finally over, and an absolute, crushing sadness because he had lost his mother forever.

Suddenly, the air inside Rudra's mind grew completely quiet.

The chaotic noises of the bunker vanished. A soft, warm, and beautiful voice echoed directly inside his brain. It was her true, original voice—the voice of the beautiful queen who used to brush his hair by the fireplace when he was a child.

“Do not cry, my beautiful boy... My sweet Rudra.”

Rudra looked at the screen, tears pouring from behind his plastic mask.

On the monitor, the hideous, deformed face of the monster slowly turned toward the sky. And for a single fraction of a second, the mutation seemed to fade away. Rudra could see the gentle, loving smile of his mother looking back at him through the camera.

“I am finally free from the metal table. I am finally going to see your father again. You have fought so bravely, my prince. You have carried the weight of a dead world on your small shoulders. I am so proud to be your mother.”

The smile on her face grew wider, full of an unyielding, maternal love that no amount of human science could ever distort.

“Good bye, son... I love you. Live... and be the king you were born to be.”

The purple light vanished completely. Her body turned into a quiet, still form in the mud.

Queen Quartha was dead.

The last relic of the ancient empire of Crysalune had left the earth.

ACT 8: THE SIX DAYS OF ATTRITION

Part 1: The Infinite Horde

Time ceased to be a sequence of hours. It became a blur of blood, lead, and survival.

The death of the queen and the falcon did not end the siege. Maanjin was still outside, his regeneration cells stabilizing. He did not enter the bunker himself; he ordered a total lock down.

The conflict stretched into a grueling six days of nonstop attrition warfare.

During these six days, the Great Criminal Organization sent a massive extra backup wave of 100 fresh, heavily armed soldiers into the forest to reinforce Maanjin's positions.

Rudra was completely trapped inside the dark, concrete corridors of the underground base. He had no food. He had no water. His body was completely leaking blood from the knife wound in his stomach.

He became an animal. He moved through the ventilation pipes, dropping down into the dark rooms to execute small groups of soldiers before vanishing back into the walls.

- Day 2: He picked off 10 soldiers in the Water Reservoir using silent throat slashes.
- Day 4: He eliminated 15 men in the dark corridors by rigging old weapon batteries to explode.
- Day 5: He killed 5 more using his broken katana, his movements slowing down with every hour.

He killed up to thirty people easily through pure, desperate willpower. But human flesh has an absolute limit. He was fighting an entire global empire with nothing but a broken body and a dying sword.

ACT 9: THE BROKEN PRINCE

Part 1: The Anatomical Toll

On the sixth night, the defense finally collapsed.

Rudra stumbled out into the main hall of the underground base. He could no longer hold his sword with two hands. The toll of the six-day siege was written on his physical anatomy in a horrific fashion:

- The Left Arm: Completely severed at the elbow by a heavy high-caliber bullet on Day 4.
- The Eyes: Both of his eyes had been permanently blinded, pierced through the mask by razor-sharp shrapnel from a grenade blast. He was moving completely by sound and feel.
- The Tongue: Cut in half by his own teeth during a heavy fall, leaving him completely unable to speak.

- The Torso: Two fresh combat knives were buried deep inside his stomach, left there by the last wave of infantry he had slaughtered.

He was a broken, bleeding ruin of a man. He stood in the center of the dark room, his breath sounding like a dying engine.

The heavy steel doors blew open. Maanjin walked into the room, followed by the remaining twenty scientists and a final squad of soldiers.

Maanjin looked at the mangled, one-armed, blind figure of Rudra. He let out a loud, arrogant laugh that shook the concrete walls.

"Look at the great prince of Crysa!" Maanjin mocked, walking up to him slowly. "Look at this pathetic piece of trash! You killed my men, you stole my experiment, but look at you now! You cannot see me! You cannot even speak your final words!"

Rudra tried to raise his katana with his remaining right hand, but his muscles completely failed him. The sword fell from his fingers, clattering against the concrete floor.

Maanjin stepped forward, his purple-veined leg whipping through the air with a demonic, monstrous strength.

CRACK.

The final kick landed directly against Rudra's chest, shattering his ribs and sending his body flying across the room. He crashed against the concrete wall and fell limp onto the floor.

His consciousness faded into pitch-black darkness. He fainted, his heart beating so slowly that the scientists smiled.

"He's finished," a scientist said. "Should we bring his body to the truck?"

"Leave him for a second," Maanjin laughed, wiping the blood from his talons. "I want to watch him rot in his own blood."

ACT 10: THE PASSING OF THE CROWN

Part 1: The Dialogue of the King

Inside the dark void of Rudra's unconscious mind, the silence was absolute.

Then, a soft, scratching sound echoed against the concrete floor.

The small Egyptian cat, Moon, walked out from the shadows of the room. It walked past the standing soldiers, who stared at it in sudden, inexplicable shock. There was something different about the cat now. A heavy, terrifying gravity was radiating from its small body, making the air in the room so dense that the soldiers could barely breathe.

Moon walked up to Rudra's mangled, lifeless face. It looked down at his blind eyes and his missing arm.

Suddenly, a voice echoed directly inside Rudra's dying soul. It wasn't a cat's meow. It was a deep, ancient, and breathtakingly royal voice that sounded like the rumbling of cosmic oceans.

"Rudra... My sweet prince. Open the eyes of your soul. Look at me."

Rudra's consciousness flickered to life inside the dark void. He could hear the voice. He felt the cat's warm breath against his skin.

"You have fought a truly great battle, Rudra," the cat spoke directly into his mind. "As a King... I am profoundly impressed by your spirit."

No human should have survived those six days. Your father Enaya would have wept with pride.”

"Moon...?" Rudra's inner voice cried out in the dark, trembling with pain and confusion. "I failed... I lost my arm... I lost my eyes... I couldn't save my mother... I am dying..."

“You are not going to die today, Rudra,” Moon replied, its voice growing infinitely heavy. “Your story cannot end in this mud. You still have to live long enough to finish the grand design. Therefore... I am going to give you my power.”

Rudra felt a sudden, deep sense of dread. "Your power? What do you mean? No... don't leave me!"

“This power will be more than enough to crush the insects in this room,” Moon continued, ignoring his panic. “But hear my final command, Prince of Crysa: After you gain this divinity... you must protect the ALL-PHOENIX from them at all costs.”

"Why are you doing this?!" Rudra's soul wept, wrapping his phantom arms around the cat's cosmic image in his mind. "Don't leave me, Moon! You are the only thing I have left in this world! I lost my dad! I lost my mom! My kingdom is bones! If you leave me too, I will be entirely alone! Please... stay with me! I don't want the power! I just want my friend!"

The cat let out a soft, gentle purr inside his mind—a sound of absolute comfort and finality.

“I have lived for ten billion years, Rudra. I have watched universes ignite and turn to ice. But these thirteen years with you and Quartha... were the most beautiful moments of my existence. Thank you for being my family. Now... wake up, King.”

Outside, in the real room, Moon reached down and bit Rudra's bleeding wrist with its sharp teeth.

Part 2: The Ignition

[The Transference of Ultimate Source]

FLASH!

The cat's body suddenly grew cold, its golden eyes closing as its life force completely drained into Rudra's veins. Moon fell limp onto his chest, dead.

But inside Rudra's broken anatomy, a cosmic eruption occurred.

The chakra points all along his spine, his arms, and his head activated simultaneously. A violent, blinding aura of blue, yellow, and red shades erupted from his skin, lighting up the entire underground bunker like an artificial sun. His missing left arm began to reform out of pure, hard energy light. His blind eyes snapped open, glowing with a terrifying, colorful fire.

He stood up. The concrete floor beneath his feet melted into liquid glass from the sheer heat of his aura. He reached down, and his unique, medium-sized katana flew into his hand, its steel blade humming with a cosmic song.

Maanjin and his sixty soldiers stepped back, their faces twisted in absolute, pure terror.

ACT 11: THE EXTERMINATION OF THE 10,000 PIECES

Part 1: The Human Pyramid

"Kill him! ALL OF YOU, MARCH! PIN HIM DOWN!" Maanjin screamed, his voice cracking in total panic.

The remaining 60 to 70 elite soldiers, driven by a desperate fear of death, launched a coordinated, suicidal defensive maneuver. They charged at Rudra simultaneously, throwing their heavy, armored bodies on top of each other to form a massive, solid Pyramid Structure of human flesh and iron shield plates.

They intended to trap him beneath thousands of pounds of pure physical weight, locking his limbs so Maanjin could strike.

Maanjin stood behind the massive human wall, laughing maniacally through his fear. "You have one arm of light! You cannot move beneath seventy men! You are trapped!"

Rudra stood before the massive, roaring pyramid of soldiers closing in on him. His face was completely cold. His eyes, burning with blue, yellow, and red shades, observed the scene with an absolute, terrifying coolness. He didn't see seventy men. He saw their geometric lines. He saw the space between their atoms.

He took a single, quiet step forward. He did not raise his sword high. He simply executed a basic, horizontal drawing slash.

[True Dominion: One-Slash Cleave]

SLIFT.

A single line of blinding white-hot light cut through the air. The sound was not an explosion; it was the quiet sound of space itself being cleanly unzipped.

For a fraction of a second, nothing happened. Maanjin's laughter echoed in the room.

Then, the pyramid collapsed.

Every single one of the 60 to 70 soldiers stopped moving. Their armor plates, their helmets, their weapons, and their bodies split perfectly in half along a clean, glowing line. A mountain of flesh fell to the floor in a single second. All of them were dead before their brains could register the strike.

The room fell into a dead, horrifying silence. Only Maanjin was left standing behind the wall of blood.

Part 2: The 10,000 Slices

Maanjin roared, his demon talons swinging as he tried to use his absorbed regeneration cells to strike. He moved at supersonic speed, targeting Rudra's neck. But Rudra was already behind him.

The fight was no longer a conflict; it was a total, cruel domination. For the first few minutes, Maanjin tried to defend himself effectively, his red demon eyes tracking the light. But he couldn't even touch the air around Rudra's boots.

Rudra moved like a god. Every swing of his medium-sized katana cut off Maanjin's limbs, sliced his torso, and opened his throat. Maanjin's purple regeneration steam tried to heal the wounds, but the cosmic heat of Rudra's sword was cauterizing his cells at a atomic level, stopping the healing process entirely.

Maanjin fell to his knees, his face covered in blood, his arrogance completely turned into a begging, pathetic whimpering. "Please... stop... I am Maanjin... I am the king of science..."

Rudra did not answer. He held his katana with one hand of light and one hand of bone. He looked down at the killer of his mother and father.

"Turn to dust," Rudra whispered.

He unleashed a final, ultimate slash.

SHASHASHASHASHA!

The speed of the blade created a localized vortex of steel. In a single microsecond, Maanjin's entire body was sliced into 10,000 separate pieces of raw meat, flying far away into the corners of the room before turning into black, dead ash.

The revenge was complete. Maanjin was erased from the earth.

ACT 12: THRIA AND THE CREATOR'S DESTROYER

Part 1: The 5th-Dimensional Sight

The battle was over. The silence returned to the ruined bunker.

Rudra dropped his sword. He looked at his hands, then looked around the room. His 3rd-dimensional human vision was completely gone. What he was seeing now was not normal. It was a mind-shattering expansion of reality.

He could see the world like a microscope, tracking the movement of cells and atoms. He could see multiple timelines stretching out from his current position like glowing paths into the future and past.

When he turned his face toward the concrete walls, the solid matter disappeared. He could see the 3rd-dimensional world completely covered and swallowed by a massive, breathtaking 5th-dimensional world filled with impossible geometry and shifting light.

"This... this is what Mom told me about," Rudra muttered, his voice shaking. "I can see the dimensions... I can see the timelines."

He looked down at the dead body of the small cat, Moon, lying on the floor.

"If Moon held this power... who exactly was he? Why did he ask me to protect the ALL-PHOENIX? What is the All-Phoenix?"

"It is our sun."

Part 2: The Great Silhouette

Rudra spun around instantly. He had not noticed any footsteps. He had not sensed any energy presence.

Standing in the center of the ruined room was an old man. He did not look like a normal human, but he was human. His body seemed to exist in a state of constant vibration, his clothes made of a strange, dark material that absorbed the colorful light of the room.

Rudra raised his sword, his glowing eyes narrowing. "Who are you? What is this place?"

The old man smiled gently, his eyes deep with an ancient wisdom.

"This place?" the old man spoke, his voice vibrating across multiple timelines simultaneously. "This place is called 'Thria.' It is Earth, my boy... but it is not the 3D world your human eyes grew up in. This is the 5th-dimensional layer of Earth. We are located right here, but the people of your earth cannot see us because their vision lacks the capacity to process this light. But we can see them perfectly."

The old man took a step forward, bowing his head slightly out of respect for Rudra's new power.

"By the way... I am one of the leaders of this world. My name is Kara. I am one of the entities known as the GREAT SILHOUETTES. Just like your beautiful queen, X-Lean... or as you called her, Quartha. She was once one of us. An Ex-Silhouette."

Rudra's heart skipped a beat. "You... you knew my queen? You knew my mother?"

"Yes," Kara replied, his face turning serious, almost sad. "I knew her well. And I know why she went to your planet. Rudra... the main purpose of her visit to Earth one thousand years ago... was to kill you."

[The Shock of the Truth]

Rudra staggered backward, his energy arm flickering. "What...? No... she saved me! She adopted me! She loved me!"

"That was her mistake," Kara spoke softly. "We sent her to your planet because you are the anomaly, Rudra. You are the one who is destined to destroy this entire planet. You are the catalyst for the end of the world. She was our greatest knight, sent to eliminate the threat before your birth. But when she arrived, she lost her memory... and instead of killing you, she protected you. She chose love over her duty to Thria."

Rudra's brain was melting from the cosmic weight of the information. "Why... why would I destroy the planet? What is happening here?!"

Kara looked up toward the ceiling, his eyes piercing through the concrete, staring directly at the sun outside.

"The current ruler of our 5th-dimensional world betrayed the True Creator of the Universe because of the ALL-PHOENIX," Kara explained, his voice turning into a heavy, dark whisper. "The Creator, in his anger, told the ruler: 'I may not defeat you today. But in the future, I will return as both the Creator and the Destroyer of the Universe. When that time comes to protect the All-Phoenix... I will destroy this entire world and maintain Earth as the primary source of living.' And then, the Creator left this plane... and went to your world to hide."

Rudra looked down at the small, dead body of the cat on the floor. His breath caught in his throat. A terrifying, beautiful realization began to form in his mind.

"My place...?" Rudra whispered, tears rising in his eyes.

Kara looked directly into Rudra's burning, colorful pupils and dropped the final, mind-shattering truth of Volume 1:

"Yes, Rudra. Your pet cat, Moon... was the literal God of this Universe. And you... you are the Destroyer he chose to execute his wrath. In order to protect my world of Thria... I must kill you right here, right now."

Kara drew an impossible, glowing blade from the empty air.

Rudra held his katana, his blue, yellow, and red eyes burning with the power of a dead god.

The war for the universe had officially begun.

END OF VOLUME 1

